

Distal Biorheology (Biorheology) is a technique used to study the mechanical properties of cells and tissues. It involves the application of a controlled mechanical force to a sample, which is then measured using a specialized instrument. The resulting data can be used to understand the mechanical behavior of cells and tissues under various conditions, such as during disease progression or in response to treatment.